The art of paying attention

Begin with the page

There is a particular kind of quiet that arrives when we begin to read. A sentence takes the place of a notification. An idea has a little longer to settle.

Good tools make this transition easy. They open the door, then step aside. They give us a clear page, comfortable space, and the freedom to find our own pace.

Leave room in the margins

Find your own pace

A page is more than the words printed on it. Space gives those words a rhythm. A generous margin creates a place to rest.

Some pages invite a quick glance. Others ask us to slow down, move backward, or linger over a single thought.

Keep what helps you read

A place to return to Open a document. Find your place. Make the words a little larger. Turn to the next page. These small actions form the foundation of a reading experience.

Start with a page and a little room around it. Let everything else earn its place.
